Short description:

The aim of the two-day event was to analyse the problem depicted in its subject: "A city dweller - who's that? - Modern methods for collecting data about city inhabitants." The first day of the event consisted of a conference during which the representatives of project partners and project scientific experts presented their experiences and good practices in the 2 project areas: Strategic monitoring, Quality of life research. The second day was mainly devoted to the topic of Social consultations. The lecturers, including representatives of partners, presented best practices linked with enhancing involvement of their cities' dwellers in local development. In the afternoon of the second day two parallel workshops were conducted by the local "Miasta 2.0" group. The first workshop focused on the implementation of participatory budgets (planning of city budget with involvement of citizens), which have been recently emerging in Polish cities. The second workshop focused on geo-questionnaires: an online participatory mapping tool that can be used in research on the quality of life and the quality of urban spaces. Participants were involved in hands-on exercises that helped them discover how to use these methods in a way that would best meet the needs of local communities.
